STOLEN BABY FOUND: WOMAN ARRESTED

Mrs. Spiro, Who Had Lost Two, So Lonesome She Just Had to Take Blue Eyed Child.

MYSTERY SOON SOLVED

Margaret Murray's Mamma and Abductor Had Once Lived in Same House.

A most self-possessed and untroubled young heroine is Miss Margaret Murray. Storm centre of an adventure which sent her family nearly out of their minds with terror, landed her on the front page of most of the evening papers, and kept a squad of new women police reserve out all night feeling highly important ever their first real sleuth job. Miss Murray, in her home, at 285 Fifteenth street, yesterday, closed her eyes in a blass manner when requested for an interview, and emitted a liquid gurgle which seemed to say that she should worky about a little kidnapping affair with a bottle like that glued to her lips For Miss Murray is only three weeks old, and her mind at present registers little but a desire for milk. And according to Dr. Garvin of Volunteer Hospital, who examined her immediately ofter she was recovered from her abafter she was recovered from her abductor, Mrs. Rose Spire of 288 Front street. Manhattan, she appeared to have had plenty of food and every comfort
during her short stay in Mrs. Spiro's home. But if Margaret was nonchalant her parents were not. They gazed at their first child as she reclined in her cradle as it they never meant to let her out of their sixth again.

her out of their sight again.

Over and over Mamma Murray told the story—how she was just out of Thursday and thought she'd take the baby out for a ride in her new carriage, and just left her for a minute outthat store at Fifth avenue and Ninth street, which she believed was per-fectly safe, while she went in to look at some pretty white cambric that she thought she might buy to make Margaret a dress when she outgrew the one that was made for her before she was born. And when she came out the carriage was empty—nothing in it but the little pink and white blankets tossed hastily

Like a Scene in a Story Book.

"I thought I'd go out of my mind," said Manma Murray. Her sister, who had come in from her flat across the hall to help tell the story, said she didn't understand how such a thing, right out of a story book, could happen on Fifth avenue and Ninth street.

avenue and Ninth street.
"I've always left my baby there when I was shopping, and look at her!" she exclaimed, pointing to a fat three-yeareld in defence of the safe character of rifth avenue and Ninth street. Brook-lyn, as a resting place for bables. But it was just there that young Mrs. Spiro, rambling along to kill time till her mother, whom she had gone to Brooklyn to visit, should return home, picked Margaret out of her carriage and carried her off. Mrs. Suice was not so carried her off. Mrs. Spiro was not so happy as Mrs. Murray, for she had no child, only a great hunger in her poor, rather childlike brain for a small form o hold in her arms, a little voice to cry o her. And when she saw Margaret ving there she couldn't resist catching her up and carrying her to the home that seemed so empty without a baby. That, at least, is the story she told Magistrate Reynolds in the Fifth avenue police court and Mr. and Mrs. David Murray, and the Murrays at last be-leved her and said that if it could be eft to them they wouldn't press the charge.

The Magistrate, however, felt that kidnapping must be treated more severely and held Mrs. Spiro in $1,500 ball for examination Monday morning. Daniel Spiro, her husband, was unable to produce the bail and Mrs. Spiro spent last night in Raymond street jail, cryless and also because she was begin-ning to realize that in yielding to her earning she had committed a punish Betrayed by the Newspapers.

It was Mr. Spiro who made his wife ake Margaret to the Elizabeth street take Margaret to the Elizabeth street police station yesterday after a night she had spent in caring for the crying child. The wife had told him that the baby was her own child, born to her, and when she falled to make him believe this she said that she had found the little one in a subway station. She refressed Margaret in one of the little givens that she had made for her two bables, who died at birth, and gave her milk from the bottle she had bought for them.

for them.

Mr. Spiro, starting, puzzled, for his work, saw in the papers the story of the kidnapping of Margaret Murray. He read how Mrs. J. McNerney of 471 Third, avenue, Brooklyn, had seen a shabbily dressed woman snatch the baby from the carriage in front of McCormack's dry goods store at 448 Fifth avenue, in Brooklyn, and had followed her to question her, but lost her. The story said that Margaret had blue eves and reddish that Margaret had blue eyes and reddish hair. The child in his home had blue eyes and reddish hair. Mr. Spiro re-turned and bade his wife follow him to the station, and she, crying bitterly,

A quick notification of Brooklyn headcuarters sent Mrs. Murray hurrying to Manhattan with Detective Duffey. And, Strangely enough, the two women recognized each other as having several years ago lived in the same house and having worked in the same veiling factory. "But I didn't know this was your

Mrs. Spiro first insisted she found the baby in the Canal street subway station, but when Mrs. McNerney identified her she broke down and confessed. Her husband said he believed her mind was tem-perarily unhinged by her desire for a baby. When she left him yesterday to weit her mother she told him she couldn't
